

Reena Goldthree

Dr. Reena Goldthree took a love of intensive scholarship at University City High School all the way to the Ivy League, where she became an assistant professor at Dartmouth College and is now an assistant professor in the Department of African American Studies at Princeton University. She is also an associated faculty member in Princeton's Program in Gender and Sexuality Studies and in the Program in Latin American Studies. Goldthree specializes in the history of Latin America and the Caribbean, with a focus on social movements, political theory, labor and migration, and Caribbean feminism.

Reena
Goldthree
Class of 1999

She earned her bachelor's degree from Columbia University and her master's and doctorate degrees from Duke University. In addition to publishing in dozens of academic and general journals, she has been honored with fellowships and grants from prestigious organizations, including the Mellon Foundation, Woodrow Wilson Foundation and Fulbright Foundation. Her book Democracy Shall be no Empty Romance: War and the Politics of Empire in the Greater Caribbean examines how the crisis of World War I transformed the Afro-Caribbeans' understanding of and engagements with the British Empire.