

2011 Hall of Fame Inductee

Alan R. Spector

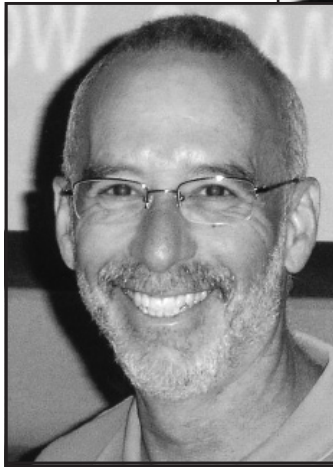

Class of 1964

After graduating from UCHS in 1964, Alan Spector earned a bachelor of science in electrical engineering from the University of Missouri – Rolla.

Following a successful 33-year career with Procter & Gamble, from which he retired as Director of Worldwide Quality Assurance and during which he was a co-inventor of their first patent for refastenable tapes on disposable diapers, this avid baseball player and enthusiast authored his first book Baseball: Never Too Old to Play the Game, published in 2007. He also authored Hail Hail to U City High, published in 2009; Your Retirement Quest, published in 2010, and most recently the centennial commemorative book, University City Schools: Our First 100 Years, published in 2011 in conjunction with the School District of University City. He is currently working on his first novel. Spector has also lectured extensively in creative writing classes, at management and quality assurance workshops, and in retirement planning seminars.

His volunteerism includes receiving the Cincinnati United Way Community Leadership Award in 2006. He has volunteered with Every Child Succeeds, a Cincinnati-based in-home visitation program for at-risk families and was co-founder of the Cincinnati Initiative to Reduce Violence, a community initiative to prevent gang-related homicides. In 2011, he began spearheading Lifeplan, a mentorship program to support freshmen at University City High School.
